CLEVELAND, TUESDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 19, 1858.

BY BILLY ROVER, ESQ. I was in the town of Hinckley A week or two ago, And heard the early settlers tell The tale I write below.

MORNING LEADER.

THE HINCKLEY HUNT ... A POEM-

The scene that in the tale appears, DRY GOODS You will please remember, Lies in the past just forty years. From our next December.

NEW STYLE DRESS GOODS Cleveland was then a field of stumps, With cabins here and there,

And deemed by many eastern gumps The borders of despair. The paths that to the forest led

Unfit for wagon, cart, or sled, The vilest ever seen. Traced out by spots upon the trees, Full of bogs, roots, and crooks, Where over wallowed 'bove their knees Through mud holes, swamps, and brooks.

Then Eastern Maji thought it wrong For men to come this way, And bring their families along Designedly to stay.

In dreams they saw way down in time, A thousand years, or more, This land become a goodly clime With plenty shadow'd o'er.

But waking dured not tell the dream Lest they appear unwise, And judged it doubtful in extreme If e'er the State would rise

And when they saw men come along, With wife and children bale, With sturdy cattle, sleek and strong, They lifted up the wail: "Why will you wander to the West !

Why to Ohio go!
To perish there in want distress'd,
Or struggle back in woe!"

They hung up pictures on their walls To mock the noble men, Who dared to leave the eastern halls And seek these forests then. They pictured out the parting scene, Mid comforts cast away.

Of men in health, with raiment clean,

Refusing there to stay. Of men in dire distress, Whose quaking bones with fever burn, And filthy rags for dress.

They pictured horses fat and fair, With wagons strong and sound, And men with wives of beauty rare, All for Ohio bound.

Then pictured horses old and vile, With crows a creaking round; And men with wives of wee, the while, Back from Ohio bound;

Hoping by such sights appalling To stop the hardy fools, Whom the mighty God was calling To plant a Nation's schools.

Fools perhaps the old settlers were, Let history decide: 'Twas God who kept them from despair While He their patience tried.

He had a work for them to do. Work by himself laid out: That work he wisely led them through, And brought his plans about.

The sad fears of eastern sages Kept fainting cowards there, And gave the settlers in hard stages The courage of despair.

They were a set of stalwart men, And had their pastimes hold: Wild beasts were in the forest then As on the plains of old.

That work to them was funt They wildly swept the forest through, And Nimrod's work was done

Twas but an item in their task, And no reward they thought to ask,

When they this lesser work has done, Unlike that ancient Fool, They laid aside the deadly gun, And form'd the district school

The arts of war they cease to learn, And bid its howlings cease; Their skill against the desert turn, And clothe its hills with peace.

I sing a song of by-gone days, The scene will not return: We now must win in other ways The laurels that we earn:

Than those our fathers knew: He is an idler now who gleans The fields they hunted through.

Now look back forty years and see Hinckley had scarcely lost a tree; There was one settler there.

Acorns and nuts untold; But not a single wagon track Had ever mark'd the mould.

Ages on ages it had lain Busking in rain and sun, While all the beasts that forest's train Through all its wilds had run-

In all the towns that lay around The settlers had crept in, And broke the forest with the sound That settlements begin.

For game of every kind, Where hunters rarely made a jaunt Their quiet lairs to find.

As taught to shun the settler's door, They from his cabin fled, This town became yet more and more The haunt in which they fed.

At length a message went the round To test the settlers' wout ; And see how many could be found, To join a royal hunt.

We'll form, said they, a line of men Around the town at more, And march straight to the center then With whistle, shout, and horn The game will all before us run

And to the center fly; And when our hunters work is done, Our game we'll there pile high.

The proposition pleased them well And all agreed to go,
Who had a gun, a voice to yell,
Or konkle shell to blow.

They sent committees to the place To mark the slaughtered ground, To show the place where balls might trace

They blazed a line around the center, Made plain to every eye, To show where only beasts might enter, And not a man pass by.

The call resounded for and wide Through a'l the counties round, Wherever settlers did reside, The hunters heard the sound. And little bands of jovial men,

By chosen captains led, Came forth to form the living pen, Around the slaughter bed. The day was set, the dawn drew near, To brutes the dawn of doom;

From every side the men appear In mists of morning gloom. Ontside the township's outer bounds They halt, the line to form; Until the signals tell by sounds When to commence the storm

From left to right they sound the horn, Till all their pl: ee have found, And on the breath of echoing morn The note goes quick around.

Then every man his skill employs
Some frightful sound to try;
They wall the township round with noise
Ascending to the sky.

The forest roamers doomed to death, O'er this wide border spread, As driven by a whirlwind's breath, In wild disorder fled.

Wretches within the circle found, Fly trembling as they will, From lines of men or fearful sound, Bear to the center still.

The horns may sound, the whistles scream, And voices lift their cry; But none must light the flery stream, Or let a bullet fly.

Until the signal at the center Shall bid the circle round, Upon the work of death to enter, And slay the beasts they've found.

All day the sounding wall rolls in A drate ere heard such herrid din When gath'ring to a focus.

They must their empire yield
To men who'll make their desert land
A fair and fruitful field.

No snarling wolf, nor growling bear, Nor antier'd buck, nor doe, Can the all frightening cause declare, Or tell which way to go.

Trembling they fly from vale to hill, From hill to vale they fly, Fly which way the tremblers will, Fly which way the tremblers w They find new dangers nigh. Now gathered on the slaughter ground

The deadlier sounds begin; The frightened wretches fly around The living walls within In droves of scores the panting deer,

Sweeping the circle round, Before the hunter's shot appear, A mark at ev'ry bound.

It is a wild, a thrilling sight, To see the baffled herds affright, Lo see the eyeball of the deer Out straining from his head with fear, To hear old bruin's sullen growl, To hark the wolf's despairing howl, To took along the living line That does the quivering herd confine, To see the hunter in his place, Snatch up his rifle to his face. The flash and dart of fire let fly, With crackling cohoes quick reply, To hear the hissing of the ball, To see them start in wild despair '.nd leaping high into the air Vault o'er the heads of shouting u That they may 'scape the bloody den; To see them stricken in their bound Or if they 'scape, as many did,
To see how quickly they were hid,
As from the murd'rous scenes they flew Without a pause to say adieu; Until the work of death is done, Till not a gun till not a shout, Is heard in all the woods about.

Now thrilling sights and sounds are seen, Upon new work they enter; And all more jorial than before, Drag game into the center.

Ere they their work have done; They wait till morning to divide The booty they have won.

Fore-seeing this, they gather first, From off the gury field,
The wolves they've slain whose scalps ac
A handsome bounty yield. [curses

These they give to a trusty man, To buy a giant whisky can, Off through the forest sped.

In time the man was on the ground With all his horse could pull, Joyful the jovial fellows found, He brought a barrel full.

They set the barrel on one end. They used for tapster to attend

Then, whisky made by honest men, Was drank by men upright, And none would deem it huriful then, To drink on such a night.

There every man drank what he chose, And all were men of spunk; But not a fighting jangle rose,

And not a man got drunk. They kindled fires o'er all the ground

And made the forest light, The joke, the jest, the song went round Through all that jovial night. They dress'd a bear and roast him whole But little did they cut;

More foud of fun, and flow of soul, Than of his luscious meat.

Wrapp'd round him like a fleece; 'Twould charm an Esquimaux to see His robe of dripping grease! One hunter with an oily chunk Soon chancel to grease another, Who quick resolved with pleasant spunk

In turn to grease his brother. These scuffling chance to grease a third, Who tries to grease them back. Till by their grease a fourth is stirr'd And joins the greasing pack.

Wauton now others join the fun, The oil is good for hair— Oil o'er the heads of all must run, And none his brother spare.

Twas a night of great annointing.

A night of wondrous things.

Night of instincts own appointing,
Great jubilee of kings! Great heads of a mighty nation, Unconscious who they are,

'Noint each other for their station, In Nature's temple there.

Old bruin's fat they use for oil, And whisky use for wine; Triumphant 'mid their slaughtered spoil They make their faces ship

I laugh to see the thoughtless scene Yet wonder at the sight Of marks behind the mirthful screen. By Nature made that night.

Then one web of ages ended, Warp and woof were broken, Desert from her loom descended, Slaughtered beasts her token.

Bouncing Peace, the rustic maid,

And Science took the charge.

All to herself unknown, Rude hands upon old Desert laid And dragg'd her from her throne. The pets of Solitude were slain, Improvement to enlarge, Solitude gave up her reign,

Nature held a celebration Behind that mirthful screen; Confused shadows of Creation, Were through the canvas seen.

That rude anointing did anoint A nobler race of kings, Whom Nature did herself appoint To do the noblest things Did they know their high commission? The value of their crown!

Did they see the glorious vision Before their minds let down! Ordain'd the founders of a State,

Heads of generations, Beyond all estimation great, Wonder of the nations. I gaze upon the State they founded, Wander where they hunted; Mark the growth and wealth unbounded, Light and peace unwonted :

Gaze down the future vast outspread, And tremble with surprise, To see such men the standing head Of all the hosts that rise

That rude scene marks the hour, As nothing else has done, When Desolation lost her power

Most of that jovial, noble band,

Have passed from Earth away, But still some scatter'd o'er land, Are living to this day. Now if these should have a greeting On the old hunting ground, And the people come to meeting, From all the counties round,

From whence the hunters came of old, Form the line as once of yore, Drive in the game the line would hold.

As they did drive before.

Leave not a living thing behind, Drive women, men, and boys, Drive girls in stacks of goods befin'd Before the horrid noise—

Drive oxen, horses, sheep, and dogs, Drive every goose, and hen, Drive all the calves, colts, cows, and hogs, Before the noisy men-Drive buggies, wagons, carts, and sleds, All loaded up with goods, With axes, plows, pails, pots, and beds, From out the noisy woods,

Take the whole township by surprise, And drive it in by store Till plunder at the center lies, In ev'ry shape and form.

Take every action in good part,
And call it all a Fair,
I sure would try with all my heart,
And meet the hunters there. I have myself a hunter been,

And, aided by my hounds. More than one hundred wolves have slain, On western hunting grounds. I have been myself a Pioneer From my young manhood's birth, With owls and wolves, all howling near,

Nor e'en a settler's boy ; I am a Rover wild and bold, And roving my employ. I've seen my country far and near, I love her hill sides well;

Oft slept upon the earth.

Still I am not a Settler old.

Ev'ry pebble to me is dear Beyond my power to tell. But dearer far than aught beside The Settler and his child, Around whose huts in forests wide

The wilderness hath smiled. The schools they've founded are my joy, Their temples my delight;
May God my heart and hand employ
To crown them all with light.

Say now, ye Hinckley Hunters brave, Will you have a meeting! Ere you descend into your grave, For each others greeting:

Meet and see each other's faces-Meet yourselves in private;
Then call the people from their places—
You can best contrive it.

Will to them the vast possessions You took from Solitude-Take from them their glad confessions Of lasting gratitud
